

ASCA Members Code of Conduct

ASCA's primary membership base has historically been the government sector, with a particular focus on Local Government who are usually at the front line in developing and fostering Smart Communities.

ASCA, however, recognises the important role that the private sector plays by developing new technologies and driving innovation to support continuous improvement. ASCA also recognises that Smart City professionals are likely to move between organisations during their career, and the whole sector can benefit by having highly skilled, knowledgeable and well-networked professionals working across all areas. As such, ASCA welcomes members from all sectors and organisations on the common understanding that the aim of becoming an ASCA member is to share peer-to-peer knowledge, create networks and collectively help to raise the skills and competence of Smart Communities professionals across Australia.

We strongly encourage members to network and build relationships with other members from across Australia. However, ASCA members should not use their membership as an opportunity to market or promote products and solutions to other ASCA members.

There will be regular event sponsorship opportunities where those promotional opportunities will be provided. The ASCA Board reserves the right to suspend and/or cancel memberships in the instance where the peer-to-peer relationships of our members have been taken advantage of for commercial purposes.
